DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Waterloo is situated near the headwater of the north branch of Trippe Creek, across the creek from the new development called Canterbury.

The house faces the road along an allee of catalpa trees. Its facade is a very plain five bay long, three story facade with plain overhanging roof and eave. In front of the central door is a hooded porch, but there was originally a porch across the entire facade. Above the door is a double window with shutters with canopy over them, similar to the treatment in Italianate villa towers. On its third story is a gable rising above the eave line suggesting a tower. The walls of the building have been covered with asbestos siding and the windows have 4/4 sash. Only the attic windows and the central window of the second story retain original shutters. The attic windows are small and have 2/2 sash. A chimney rises within each gable above the 'A' roof. The building is two days deep with a two story wing on the rear.

Its plan is quite simple with a central stair hall flanked by two large rooms. The wing is accessible from the hall and north room. Most of the interior is intact, including the fine mid-century stair, the old doors, plaster cornice, and medallions and mantels.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The house, although never a really superior stylish dwelling, was originally a very well appointed Italianate farmhouse. Many of the features which made it attractive have been removed, such as the porch, shutters and the new wall covering. With some attention to detail Waterloo could once again be a fine dwelling with a superb water site.

Burned, spring 1978.
